From Director's Desk

About 15-20 years back, when I was doing my intensive post-doctoral legal research I had lots of occasions for discussions with legal luminaries regarding dependence on use of computers. During the course of such meetings, discussions and debates, my regular comment used to be that use of computers shall only be supplementary to and shall not supplant the system of reading law books.

My view point is changing with the passage of time in this contemporary world as I now find that reading and referring to conventional books is being reduced day-by-day in comparison with 'electronic material' and proportion in which tendering of 'electronic evidence' in comparison to 'conventional evidence' in courts of law is rapidly increasing every day.

Therefore, in my opinion on the larger canvas we need to make our special efforts to understand and devise better kind of mechanism to deal with 'electronic evidence' not only in daily life but also with respect to investigation and proof in a court of law before it gets too late.

With these words, I endorse this bulletin to our esteemed readers. Any comments for suitable improvements in its publication are also solicited.
